The most common electrical connectors used in the medical field are known as universal connectors wherein a threaded male connector is matingly threaded into a receiving receptacle and secured therein by a set screw. Due to the set screw, the threaded male connector can be removed from the receiving receptacle only in a plurality of discrete positions. The receiving receptacle is typically placed in a sealed envelope or sealed package which prevents the introduction of any moisture into the electrical contact areas. Such sealing of the electrical connector is usually accomplished by enclosing the connector in a hermetically sealed container. However, this type of connector has the disadvantage of relying on a set screw for securing the connector in place. A further connector is the locked pin connector which has a male connector having a number of male terminal pins extending therefrom and a female connector having a number of female terminal pins extending therefrom.

These male and female connectors are oriented with the male connector receiving the female connector. The female connector is first inserted into the receiving cavity and the male connector thereafter advances and is secured in position by a set screw at the end of the female connector. Here again, since the sealed cavity must be opened in order to remove the connector and a number of conductive parts are located within the cavity, the connector, whether male or female, can be removed only in a limited

To assess sexual functioning in men with ankylosing spondylitis (AS), to determine the prevalence of sexual dysfunction, and to correlate sex and sexual function with the clinical status of AS. Cross-sectional study. Department of Rheumatology, Medical Hospital, Thessaloniki, Greece. Two hundred and eight men with a diagnosis of AS. The study population was assessed for sexual dysfunction using a computerized questionnaire. Disease activity was assessed using the Bath Ankylosing Spondylitis Disease Activity Index (BASDAI), while sexual function was assessed by the Sexual Functioning Questionnaire (SFQ) and sexual drive by the desire subscale of the Multidimensional Assessment of Sexual Functioning Questionnaire (MADRS-4). Of the patients, 82% experienced sexual dysfunction. Thirty-four percent had low sexual drive, 25% had low sexual activity, 17% had erectile dysfunction (ED), and 41% had nocturnal erections. The mean scores for all aspects of sexual function (excluding sexual drive) in patients with AS were significantly lower than those of a healthy control group. The only aspect of sexual function that was significantly associated with the clinical status of the disease was sexual activity. The prevalence of sexual dysfunction in patients with AS is high. Because it is associated with poor AS symptoms, it is important to assess it. Management of sexual dysfunction should be a part of the patient's overall treatment.
