Digital.Crystal-shaped nanodots on a semiconductor substrate using an atomic force microscope. We report the fabrication of crystal-shaped nanodots on a (001)-orientated Si(001) wafer by mechanical exfoliation. A single-crystalline Si nanowire was obtained by anisotropic etching of a (001)-oriented Si(001) wafer, and a nanodot, consisting of atomic-scale crystal grains and having a flat bottom, was obtained by removing the Si nanowire and thin Si layer from the Si(001) surface. The top view of the atomic force microscope (AFM) image of the crystal-shaped nanodot showed that the average size of the grains was approximately 5 nm. The crystal shape is the same as that of the grain boundary structure, suggesting that the crystal growth is a bottom-up process, as is generally accepted. The crystal structure was investigated by transmission electron microscopy, AFM and x-ray diffraction measurements, and the orientations of the nanodots were determined. The present work shows the usefulness of nanodots for studying the relationship between microstructure and photoluminescence or domain structures, which can be promising for device fabrication. Redistribution and dephosphorylation of Ppp2r1c in murine erythroleukemia cells in response to serum stimulation. We have investigated the phosphatase regulatory subunit Ppp2r1c/PR62, a protein first identified in erythroid cells as a SDS-resistant phosphoprotein. The amount of Ppp2r1c protein increases during the late stages of erythroid differentiation and e79caf774b
