In a C# web application I want to generate some HTML for a website (for example: information about a single football match) based on a few pieces of information (for example: the date and the location of the match) and a "default" piece of information (for example: if no match information is available, a result is displayed instead). Now imagine that this website is visited by many users from around the world and that there is no static information, so the website has to generate the HTML for the particular date/time and location by querying the database on the server side. For example, the server looks up the site map information in a database (for example: one map for each week of the season) and generates one HTML page for each week. This should include links to the page containing the information about the particular match (for example: information about the teams and the match itself, ratings, etc.). Now the thing is: I want to optimize this site (in terms of speed and memory usage). I have thought about storing the page information in a database, but I'm not sure how to generate this in the best way. Can you give me some recommendations? A: This is going to be a lot faster than trying to generate a single page, but I am also assuming that this is not the only place the map data is going to be used. My suggestion is that you build your map data into a C# Data
